SINCE 1881

What troubles we face; what trials beset us; How vividly does the mind reproduce the ghosts of past indiscretions, and torment us with fear of future punishment. I now, as the culprit before a Priest, shall disclose past transgressions—Ted and I were bosom friends, tried and true: That human lived not who could convince either of his pals that the other was ought but perfection—George, screamed Ted in boisterous glee, "today we fish; gird your loins, gather your lines, and collect the juiciest of the tender worm for an harvest of the most sportive trout that glides the pools of our turbulent creek." We were soon 'neath the falls, and success was varied until Ted hooked a beauty, far the greater in averdupois to all of my string:—That fish, and "Old Nick," I solemnly believe were joint, bounden coworkers, for my sense of righteousness and bands of friendship were dispelled and disjoined from the moment my eye fastened gaze on that piscatorial giant. Our path homeward led by the popularly used Catholic cemetery from whence our paths diverged, and he being late, and all fish hung on one string, it was agreed for me to separate his catch and leave under a bench for his later obtainment. It was almost the hour when spooks stretch their limbs, flutter their robes, and as the chirping cricket and croaking frog tunes each dismal lile, the solitude becomes so monotonously intense, and the surroundings so dreary, that schoolboys feel that gruesome, nervous tension, which feeds superstition, and makes cowards of the weakminded.—That beauteous "trout" was in my grasp; I hesitated, looked disappointedly at my bunch of minnows, as compared, crushed the righteous feeling which imparts the sense of honor, and was just placing a wire through his gills, when horror of horrors, a low mournful strain caught mine ear, emanating (which I sincerely believed a demon's wail) from the Rector's throat as he rehearsed his litany for the coming Sabbath, and as the Latin prologue struck mine ear, it seemed to murmur, "thief! thief! to rob your dearest friend, who placed an unflinching trust in thy villainous being!"—I jumped, trembled, attempted to raise, and likewise yell, but my voice failed, my muscles stiffened, my eyes bulged, mouth opened, and that jaunty cap, the pride of my youth, raised as by magic with the electrified hair, and fell crumpled at my feet. By this time the "Holy Father" had turned a corner of the mausoleum, and his priestly robes darkened by a sombre shading, fairly magnetized my being, driving double distilled terror to my soul as I was sure I beheld the "Devil" who sought my body for his gnet, and my soul for his furnace: The rigidity of my muscles was now intense; my throat clogged, my brain mazed and whirled as a tumbling meteor, while breaths were so spasmodic that I fairly wheezed. Death would have soon relieved me had not a cold chill relaxed my nerves, allowing me to dart as if force propelled these agile limbs, the motion of which became more rapid at each stride. I think the word "damnation" served for a time wand, as momentum and damnation paced together most regularly. I bounded into mother's room, winded and exhausted, relating in detail the ghost experience, but peeping not a word about fish. When meeting Ted I lied oftener and more complacently, and more satisfactorily, than I ever dreamed I could, and THAT has rankled in my breast, and served as a tortuous ember, until now, having confessed my sins, joined the church, and fully repented, I feel that I am "born again," and remodeled.
